

Command and Control in a Combination Department

Commanding an incident alone is fast paced and focus driven, with critical decisions being made based solely on experience and training. Combination departments face additional complexities with incident command and control. From motor vehicle collisions to wildland and structure fires, this class will teach participants how to adapt to a wide range of incidents and crews with varying degrees of experience. Through interactive discussions, best practices will be highlighted, avoidable pit falls identified, and tips will be provided on engaging stakeholders for the development of a new command and control system. NFPA 1561 will be reviewed, with specific attention on its impact to differing organization types. If you are looking to improve command capabilities and enhance on-scene accountability, this class is for you.
